Pathette Story Showing the Strength of a Moukey Mother's Love. One morning on a rocky hill, sparsely covered with small trees, I disturbed a troop of monkeys which made a bolt over the open ground to some thicker forests in the valley below. Three, how-ward ever, disregarding me, remained in one tree, making horrible noises at something underneath. I soon discovered that the object of their indignation was a brutal-looking black dog, which was busily devouring something at the root of the tree. When the dog saw me it made off, carrying in its mouth a black thing, like a little animal, with legs and a long tail. I guessed it was a baby monkey and gave chase as hard as I could, but the dog made good its escape without dropping its prey.

Coming back to the tree I searched the ground and found the body of auother little infant still warm. How did of that brute? I have often seen an infant of the same size clinging to its mother's breast in perfect rest and second in the same size clinging to its mother's breast in perfect rest and second in the same size clinging to its mother's breast in perfect rest and second in the same size clinging to its same second in the same second i of that brute? I have often seen an infant of the same size clinging to its mother's breast in perfect rest and security while she took the most daring bounds from tree to tree. Perhaps the dog surprised the monkeys on the open ground and pressed the mother so hard that she dropped her offspring to save her own life. Or perhaps they were enjoying a plenic in fancied security, and had laid down their little ones when the Zulu rushed upon them. While I was examining the limp little body to see whether life was extinct a pitiful wall told me that its mother was watching me. She had retired to another tree some distance off, and was waisfully gazing at me, wondering what I was doing with her precious babe. I saw that there was no hope, but I retired and hid myself to see what she would do. She came down at once and appropriated the most distrasting me.
